

“My Core Values”—

At my core, I am someone who seeks meaning or find things holistically in my work and the impact it creates. My values are reflections of who I am, recognized as a part of my nature through experiences with diverse individuals and organizations with varied cultures. Emotional intelligence, efficiency, integrity, continuous improvement, and creativity shape my decisions, my interactions, and the way I approach challenges. While my goals are still evolving, I know that my strengths lie in creative thinking, analytical problem-solving, and efficiency through technology-driven solutions. Most importantly, I aspire to contribute to workplaces that are not just more efficient and sustainable but also more human-centered, where people thrive around a psychologically safe workplace, not just function.

That plays a part in emotional intelligence, which is perhaps the most defining aspect of how I approach both work and life. I believe this is the center of how I am able to exercise self-awareness and empathy, no matter what position I am in life. Overall, this has allowed me to connect deeply with others, understand their perspectives, and foster genuine relationships.

Efficiency is a value I hold close, especially in the fast-paced world of technology and problem-solving. My professional experiences have shown me how we usually make things complicated or don't focus on what's really important. This value has driven me to help people do things right, with minimal waste and maximum impact by streamlining our work and continuously seeking ways to improve.

Integrity, to me, means having pure intentions and ensuring that my motives are genuine, sincere, and free from deceit. This is closely related to being honest in my conversations and consistently doing what is right, even when it's challenging.

Continuous improvement is the heartbeat of my journey. I believe there's always room for growth for everyone, regardless of their education or personal and work experiences. Reflecting on and learning from mistakes, as well as seeking knowledge through self-learning, professional development and my ongoing journey in pursuing high level of education to formulate my personal framework, excites me and fuels my vision in life.

Lastly, creativity has been my silent companion, connecting with my other values. I enjoy thinking of ideas and don't stop with just one, and, I keep going and playing with it until I see beyond conventional outputs. This personal core value is deeply ingrained in my nature, helping me with personal development through creating art or driving innovation at work and finding unique solutions to complex problems.
